Tells of Growth in South.

"The American library is no longer : on a side street," declared Katharine H on "Recent Library Development in the South," at the session last night at Con-tinental Memorial Hall. "It is no longer static; it is dynamic," she said.

"In 1914 the development of the modern library movement in the south has been continuous and it is keeping pace with the great commercial progress of the south. Southern conservation, with its aversion to paternalism, has finally accepted the free public library as a necessary educational institution, as is shown in the establishment of approximately ninety-one libraries in the twelve southern states since 1607, representing an expenditure of more than $1,500,000. A tribute to the vitality of the public library movement has been the winning of educated citizens, men and women.

by the executive hoard some time during the past half century. To George Ticknor, historian of Spanish literature, Mr.

Bolton gives credit as the master mind that saw the benefits to be derived from a great circulating library for the people, with popular books of the day purchased in sufficient numbers so that they could be read and discussed while they were a factor in the life of the moment. He declared it was to Ticknor that we owe the governing spirit of the public library of the day.

"The past fifty years form an era of development along technical lines, as well as in the testing of public responsibility, through which we have come to trust our own people as no nation ever did before," he said. "We have come to understand something about the proper housing of books and the art of bringing their presence and value home to the people; we have opened wide our doors to the children—little children—and have extended our influence through branch buildings to every corner of a big city will not go to the library. the books had better come to him."

Speaking of the effect of this great expansion in the system of circulation of books. Mr. Bolton made the significant assertion that "the letter carrier cannot in any way equal the personality of the librarian as a guide and friend." In library work, he declared that we need leaders who do not limit their horizon to the library field, nor to the work for which they are paid. "In the big libraries we need library knowledge plus admin-

Whatever decrease in scholarship we may detect during the adjustment of the public library to the present need of a popular uplift, there will in good time be a reaction. Scholarship cannot be alienated from the library for long, even though the library books perpetuate the finest thoughts of all the ages, a tibrary will bid men to read and to think."
